Day Surgery - Instructions for patients following a General Anaesthetic

The anaesthetic drug remains in your body for 24 hours, and during this time it is slowly secreted from the body. During this 24 hour period you are under the influence of this drug, which can temporarily affect your co ordination and reasoning skills. As a result there are certain things you must not do. These include:

- Do not drive a car or any form of motorised transport, or bicycles. You will need to get someone to drive you home;
- Do not drink alcohol;
- Do not operate any machinery or electrical appliances: this includes using a kettle or saucepan;
- You should not lock the bathroom or toilet door or in any way make yourself unreachable to the person looking after you;
- Do not sign any legal documents for 48 hours afterwards.

Returning home

- Have someone to stay with you for 24 hours;
- You should drink plenty of fluids;
- A light diet should be taken;
- We advise patients to be accompanied home and go to bed or lie down on the settee for the rest of the day;
- Have a lie in the next day;

Patient Information

It will take two or three days before the anaesthetic wears off and you might feel tired for up to a week and sometimes be unable to concentrate.

Temporary side effects

After having a general anaesthetic, you may experience the following for a couple of days:

- Sore throats
- Nausea (feeling sick)
- Confusion
- Headache
